

Sean has a keen interest in the national political conversation which surrounds planning and development and is adept at helping clients navigate complex political environments at both a local and national level.

BA (Hons) International Relations – Nottingham Trent University

MA (Hons) International Political Economy – University of Sheffield

After completing a Master's degree, Sean worked as a freelance consultant on an ad-hoc basis at a London-based natural resource consultancy, operating in the peacebuilding and stakeholder engagement sector. Among other projects, Sean prepared a briefing paper on natural resource-related tensions in Somalia, which was subsequently published.

Sean joined Communications Potential in February 2018 and has since provided clients with a wide range of communications services. His experience includes developing communications strategies for a variety of audiences, organising and attending public consultation events, engaging with community groups and political stakeholders, as well as providing post-submission support. His highlights so far include helping to secure planning permission for hundreds of much-needed homes in the South-East of England, as well as playing a key role in winning support for the expansion of a challenger bank.

Sean has a keen interest in the national political conversation which surrounds planning and development and is adept at helping clients navigate complex political environments at both a local and national level.

Outside of work, Sean has recently moved to London from the home counties, and can be found exploring the parks and streets of South London, probably whilst reading a current affairs blog!

sean.groves@communicationspotential.co.uk